Planner Attacked While Putting Out Controls Shock!

The entire world orienteering community has been staggered by the news that an official was set upon by a bunch of vicious assailants, while attempting to place a control at a knoll, north side. Luckily, after suffering grievous injury, he still had enough speed to out-run his pursuers. Unwilling to see the event jeopardised, he returned carefully and put the flag on the south side of the knoll, and the local villains seemed happier by this control re-location. Local police are trying to identify the criminals: 'We know that they all had yellow and black stripes, and hope that the public will assist by reporting any hoodlums fitting this description.' The planner is recovering at home, but is still scratching the spots where he was stung.

After this traumatic start, everything else went well. The thunderstorms which had been forecast missed us, and we enjoyed a fine sunny evening. The navigation was generally straight-forward, but the competitors seemed to appreciate being able to find controls without having to use a machete and flame-thrower! It was good to have a school group as well, making a yellow course worthwhile.
